PREFACE.

The proceedings known as Special Commissions of the Exchequer, when received into the custody of the Master of the Rolls, in the year 1842, had already, for reasons now unknown, been severed from the large existing collection of documents called 'Depositions taken by Commission.'

* A chronological arrangement undertaken at that time was followed, in the year 1877, by the issue of a descriptive catalogue incorporated with the 38th and following Reports of the Deputy Keeper.

In issuing the present revised list, the opportunity has been taken to re-unite detached portions of proceedings, to file together, for convenience in production, proceedings sufficiently similar in subject and date, and to modernize the more important place-names. But where a considerable variation from the modern form has been found in the spelling, or a doubt has existed as to the correctness of the identification, the original spelling has been given in brackets.

The majority of these Commissions were issued from the Court of Exchequer, for the purpose of instituting enquiries into matters affecting the revenues of the Crown.

The procedure followed in the sixteenth century is described in No. 1513. "First a letter from the Commissioners to the Sheriff signifying at what days and at what places they appoint to sit and charge any jury for the same matters, and by the same letters charging him in the meantime by himself, his under-sheriff, and by every of his bailiffs within their limits, to enquire and set down in writing particularly what they can learn or find touching the note and articles enclosed in the same letters, and to have the same certificates ready at the day and place of meeting to charge the jury."

And in No. 1510, as regards costs, we find it "ordered that the commission shall be sued out at equal charges and that party that shall be found to have done wrong in prosecuting or giving occasion of the suit shall pay the whole charges."

The resulting depositions of witnesses, presentments of juries, and certificates of commissioners have long been highly valued for the topographical and other information they contain.

Many of them relate to confiscated lands, largely monastic, unlawfully withheld or 'concealed' from the Crown, of which a definition will be found in No. 4087, lands escheated for want of heirs, marsh-lands ('oozie, slubby, or glibsey grounds'), derelict lands, and lands 'inned,' or gained, from the sea, possessions of Crown debtors and persons attainted, delinquents' estates, sequestrations, fugitives beyond seas (under the Act of 5 Richard II.), surveys of royal castles, manors, and parks, and spoil of Crown woods.

Others are concerned with illegal exports and imports, the sale of tobacco without licence, the tax of 2s. on every hearth, granted in the year 1662 in lieu of the profits from the Court of Wards and known as 'hearth-money,' surveys of ports, assignments of legal quays under statutory powers for the lading and unlading of goods, payments of stipends to clergymen and schoolmasters, treasure-trove, the observance of the statute of 33 Henry VIII. relating to wives' apparel (p. 7.) and compositions for fines for neglect to receive the order of knighthood.

With regard to these compositions, full directions to the commissioners as to the method to be adopted in arranging them with "persons who ought to make gree with us," and of the scale to be followed "according to the hability of the party compounding," will be found in No. 5146.

But though the Court of Exchequer was designed originally to deal only with matters affecting the revenue of the Crown, it is well known that its jurisdiction was gradually extended and ultimately included much private litigation which could only by a fiction be held to touch the interests of the royal purse. Hence enquiries into boundary disputes between private owners and into other difficulties and differences in the solution and adjustment of which the Crown had no direct interest are common among these proceedings. Indeed in one case, which occurred in Norfolk (No. 1625, 42 Elizabeth), the customary tenants of the Queen's manor of Pulham ingeniously attempted to use the machinery of the Court in furtherance of their own interests which were hostile to those of the Crown, and a warrant was issued to the Queen's Remembrancer to stay the filing of the commission, on the ground that the tenants had procured the issue of it to persons nominated by themselves, "purposing by this course to strengthen such encroachments and privileges as they, contrary to the ancient and true customs there used, do pretend to his Majesty's great prejudice and contrary to truth and equity."

The following List has been revised by Mr. Horace Headlam, of the Public Record Office, and he has also put together the foregoing notes on the nature of the documents enumerated in it.
